

The church, founded in the 12th century, is set in a very large churchyard. The church guide considers that 'The famous old yew tree, some 22' in girth, may go back to the founding of the church', and this is indeed a possibility. The tree is first noted in Vaughan Cornish's 1946 The Churchyard Yew and Immortality as a 'yew near the north wall of the church'. The 1953 History of the County of Sussex: noted it to be an 'ancient yew tree'.

May 1999: This male yew has a particularly fine fluted and knobby bole which breaks into many wide spreading branches at a height of about 10'. These carry much healthy growth. One substantial dead section of trunk facing the church door has fine sculptural features.

The fine drawing, on sale as a postcard in the church, did not acknowledge the artist.

Girth:

1946: 21' The Churchyard Yew and Immortality - Cornish

1997: 16m tall x 207 cm diameter at 1.5m The Sussex Tree Book - Owen Johnson

1999: 22' 1" at 18" and 21' 7" at 5' - Tim Hills

2014: 22' 5" at about 6" from the ground (side furthest from the church) - Peter Norton
