

The Clwyd Powys Archaeological Trust in 1996 reported that 'one yew tree of some age is set on the outer edge of the relict scarp in the south-east quadrant'.

This was once a very large tree, recorded in Meredith's Gazetteer as having once had a girth of 25ft - The Sacred Yew by Chetan and Brueton 1994.

2014: All that remains today is this fallen fragment that has developed into a healthy tree. A small piece of stump, seen right, hints at the former extent of this tree.

2016 Paul Wood: While remnants of the former bole are still visible at the ground, soil is being placed under the tree and in time will hide forever any remnants of the old tree. Ivy was starting to become well tangled around all parts of the tree.
