

RCB Gardner informed Cornish for his book The Churchyard Yew and Immortality (1946) that here was 'a hollow yew of great age 30 yards west of the present church'. This is found south of the A40 at The Bryn. It is necessary to stand in the adjacent field to see these remarkable features, since the male yew forms part of the boundary wall between churchyard and farm. It stands on several 'legs' and is unable to plug the gap in the wall. For the photograph I removed (and replaced) large amounts of board and wire netting, placed to prevent sheep gaining access to the churchyard.

Meredith's Gazetteer reported a girth of 24ft.

Photos:

left 1998 Tim Hills

right 2005 Geoff Garlick

