

2014: Of three villages in Wales named Llangybi, this one is found a few miles NE of Lampeter. In its churchyard, SW of the church, this fallen yew continues to grow vigorously. New branches of large girth now grow upwards from the prone tree, with a particularly large one close to its base. This suggests that the yew fell a considerable time ago. Congratulations are due to the church committee that made the decision to leave the fallen tree rather than cut it up and have it removed. The hollow shell now runs parallel to the ground, giving an opportunity to see its internal growth at close quarters.
