

‘A fine yew tree, supposed to be very old’ was reported in the 1864 Nottinghamshire. History, Directory and Gazetteer.

2009: The female yew grows ESE of the church. It has split into two distinct but well connected sections. That on the north side appeared dead, though a few branches laden with arils poked through the ivy which dominated this part of the tree. Ivy was also rampant on this other section, which is more spreading in nature. At the time of my visit the space between the two sections was being used as a dump for dead material cut from other churchyard trees. Girth was above 22' at 1'.
