

1998: All Saints is a former estate church built in the grounds of the Kinsham Court. The yew grows SE of the small church.

Much of its bole was decaying and all that remained of substance is the large hollow branch (A) which leans towards the church. Old internal stems have decayed, as has the branch at (B) which leans away from the church. From this decaying material new smaller branches have developed (C and D).

In 100/200 years it is possible that a large portion of what we see today will have disappeared and the yew will have become several fragment trees growing close to the each other.

Girth: 21' 2" at its narrowest waist close to the ground.

