

1897: 'Two yews of good size, each in its way well illustrating the effects of pollarding'. The Yew Trees of Great Britain and Ireland - Lowe

2000: Here are two female yews. The tree (left) grows just inside the entrance to the churchyard, NW of the church. It is probably a fragment of a once much larger tree. It develops two main branches at about 7'.

The larger yew (right) grows NE of the church. It has a thickened shell which leans away from the church. Its bole bursts into growth at a height of about 12'. A decaying section at the base of the tree suggests that its girth was once larger than its present 16' 7".
